Natural disasters are becoming a common occurrence across the Atlantic Coast and Southeast with hurricanes, tornados and flooding posing a serious risk to much of the region. Understanding the health and safety elements that can aid or hinder the emergency response and recovery process is critical to assuring responder safety and operational effectiveness in these challenging environments.

TAUD along with The University of Tennessee Institute for Public Service/Center for Industrial Services will conduct on-site training addressing occupational safety and health hazards that may be encountered by responders, workers and employers involved in disaster site response and recovery operations. This program will address general safety hazards found in post storm environments, electrical hazards, driving hazards, the FEMA Disaster Marking System, chain saw safety and water hazard safety practices.
